A PEEK INTO THE PAST

Mendocino Lumber Mill After 1906 Earthquake

by Carol Dominy

When the April 1906 earthquake struck Northern California, its damage reached far beyond San Francisco. In Mendocino, the lumber mill was hit hard. The massive brick smokestack, built in 1864 and standing nearly 100 feet tall, collapsed under the force of the quake, crushing parts of the boiler room and the machine shop. While the boilers themselves escaped serious harm, the mill's 15-ton flywheel cracked—an essential part of the engine that couldn't easily be replaced due to the destruction of San Francisco's foundries.

The structural damage to the mill was severe. Huge 20-by-20-inch foundation supports split and shifted out of place, and many of the heavy braces, mortised deep into the posts, were dislodged permanently. Water lines were broken throughout the facility, and a newly installed 20,000-gallon water tank was completely destroyed. While the main floor of the mill was spared, it took six weeks of determined effort to realign the building and get operations running again—though not at full capacity. Read more.
