THE GHOSTS ALWAYS TELL THEIR STORIES

by Rob Hawthorn

If there's one thing I've learned from walking around the charming town of Mendocino, it's that the town itself is alive. It breathes. It moves. Mendocino even talks to us. As I take people around town and tell them about the haunted houses, phantom horses, and the hotel guests that refuse to leave after 150 years, I realize that the ghosts also talk to us. They always tell their stories. I share what I've been told by the people who live, or lived, here—in old newspaper articles or notes left, or stories related to me in somber tones—but if I miss any little detail, I’m always corrected by the ghosts who are still with us. Curious about the Mendocino Hotel hauntings?

NORTHERN POMO: Mendocino's First People

NEW EXHIBIT!

Explore the rich culture of the Northern Pomo, who have lived on the Mendocino Coast for thousands of years. Discover the Pomo language, read about early coastal villages, admire exquisite basketry, and enjoy works of contemporary Pomo arts and crafts. Learn about the historical injustices that drove Native populations to near extinction. This exhibit is a testament to the Pomo’s enduring resilience. It was made possible by an Arts and Culture grant from the Community Foundation of Mendocino.

A Peek Into the Past

Lansing Street in Mendocino, 1906

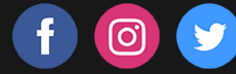

by Karen McGrath

A hand-colored promotional postcard created for the Fort Bragg Drug Store showing buildings along Lansing Street in Mendocino in 1906. The photograph from which this postcard was made was probably taken from the second floor of the Occidental Hotel, located at the southeast corner of the intersection of Lansing and Main Streets.
